

Salvaging America: A Plan for Ending Dysfunction in Politics

This book is not for politicians or their partisan supporters. It is for Americans that don't identify with a political party. An election year means being inundated by political campaign coverage on television, radio, and social media and junk mail. Listening to partisan friends talk about politicians can be extremely discouraging. All independents want is for their voice to be heard, and to contribute their ideas to policy making. But what is done in the privacy of a voting booth will never be heard by anyone, and a single vote very rarely decides an election. Election results do not reflect the consent of the governed, as the majority of people do not vote for the winner. Fifty percent of the votes cast in an election correspond to about only twenty percent of the total population. Independents have become completely frustrated with the current political system, and are fed up with politicians and partisanship, and want nothing to do with politics. Partisans and special interest groups actively discourage independents from voting. By ridiculing independents for not supporting their shallow candidates, partisans hope that independents will become bitter, calloused and not care what happens. This book offers a simple, extra-governmental solution for independents: an avenue for anyone to directly contribute to policy making, and a realistic opportunity to select nonpartisan candidates outside of the lesser of the two evils as presented to voters by the mass media. In comparison to the ultra-expensive political campaigns of today, this solution requires relatively little money, and can be put into place quite rapidly, if independents so desire.
