

Perfect Etiquette (Classic Reprint)

Civility and good breeding are necessary to success in life. Politeness never costs anything, and as nothing is ever lost by it, is it not well to cultivate it? It is safe to say, that the person possessing those virtues, are not only welcome in all society, but they can rest assured that life with them will not be a failure. Good breeding, like charity, not only covers a multitude of faults, but to a certain degree supplies the want of some virtues. In every-day life it acts good nature, and often does what good nature will not always do: it keeps both wits and fools within the bounds of decency, which the former are too apt to transgress, and which the latter never know. Good breeding implies politeness; but the latter does not imply the former, as good breeding has its weight and value, which politeness adorns and doubles by its workmanship. Unfortunately, good breeding has not reached what may be called perfection yet; but where the real gentleman or lady are met with, those two requisites of every-day life will be found as natural as water springing from a well. We may be asked to define the words, gentleman and lady, and will now proceed to do so according to our way of thinking.
