

The role of Russian religious thought in the writings of Nicolas Aleksandrovich Berdiaev, 1874-1948 Part V: THE RELIGIOUS FRUITION: PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOLARS

Nikolas Berdyaev Nicolas Berdyaev was a thinker impossible to characterize by any of the familiar classifications. Politically he was a revolutionary against the Czar, with no enthusiasm for either Nerensky or Lenin. Exiled by the Soviet regime, when abroad he found himself more favorably inclined toward the Marxists than toward the emigres. Yet he loathed the materialism, dogmatism and, above all, the oppressive tyranny of the Soviet Union. Religiously oriented in Russian Orthodoxy, he never considered himself a representative of its tenets and he was widely regarded among its priests as a heretic and renegade. As theologian he cared little for historical continuity of faith, as philosopher he was unsystematic and willfully self contradictory, while as literary man he never cared to polish his writing and despite his many books preferred oral to written expression. Yet he gave utterance to so many suggestive and illuminating ideas and he exerted so much influence that anyone who wishes to understand the thought of his time must devote serious attention to him. Now, at last, since his death, it is possible to see him whole and discover how the variegated and disparate pieces of his life actually fit together and make sense on his own terms. We have this possibility thanks to two sketches of his life and thought, the briefer one by a discerning admirer and the other by himself. George Seavers Study About Berdyaev George Seavers discriminating study, while documented from Berdyaevs own writing, is written in the authors smooth style, with much original illustration. Seaver fittingly describes Berdyaevs thought as the mystical philosophy of Per sonalism. Although the pantheistic tendencies of the mystical emphasis are brought out, it is also made clear that the spiritual life for Berdyaev is an encounter between Subject and Subject which occurs pre-eminently in Christ.

Stress on the existential and a considerable distrust of rational methods are reminiscent of Kierkegaard. But the Russian is radically unlike the Dane. Berdiaev, for example, insists emphatically upon the full humanity of Jesus and says, The whole human race offers in Christ a free response to God. This idea is characteristic of Berdiaev's elevation of the powers and high prerogatives of man and of his vigorous, everrecurrent assertion of human freedom. Christ is, indeed, by his own moral achievement, both human and divine, but this does not make him the abnormal psychological contradiction defined in the creeds. For the truly human is also the truly divine. The Russian sets forth an existential faith in the divine immanence which the Dane would have despised. In his remarkably concise yet leisurely little volume, Seaver has given an excellent brief introduction to Berdiaev's thought, sensitively portraying his main themes with helpful comparative and critical comments. However, it is through Berdiaev's own account of himself that his whole life work is to be most dearly understood as a single, living whole. The main motive of his life is here seen as a passion for freedom. Not only does he resist the petty oppressions of the family and the great oppressions of the Czarist and Communist governments. He rebels even against the disciplines of moral principles, responsible group loyalties and orderly patterns of personal living. His life is thus seen as one long Nietzschean assertion of his own personal independence. This is not always an admirable trait. Indeed, it sometimes appears that it is the epitome of sin itself, whether sin defined as proud selfassertion or as violation of acknowledged ethical principles. L.
